

Enough people have written the scientific facts that I feel no need to reiterate them. The numbers and genetics can be challenging for people without a scientific background (much like I struggle to understand what my mechanic is telling me about my car). I am overwhelmed by the caliber of people who have been working on the LUA project. These are not just people with an interest in their dogs - these people have dedicated their lives in an attempt to increase the health of our beloved Dalmatian breed. And they are qualified to do so - check out the degrees.

As a professional in animal health, I could not be happier to see a possible way around urate stones. The Dalmatian lives with enough stigmas from health and temperament in the veterinary community. We have the opportunity to vote for discussion of change. Which we should. The LUA dogs ARE Dalmatians (not pointers - however silly it possibly is to have to say that). Not liking them won't change that. They deserve the respect and recognition and I will be voting for it.
